Health and illness are considered as on-going processes along a wellness-illness sequence, in which the individual tries to reach a sustainable balance amidst needs and accessible resources. Nursing acknowledges to the reciprocal interaction among the person and the environment to aid a state of effective equilibrium or modification in the level of health at any point on the wellness-illness continuum. Nursing is supervised toward decreasing stress factors that affect or could affect the realization of the highest level of wellness by an individual, family, or community. This goal is achieved through the nursing process, a systematic, diagnostic technique used for achieving independent, interdependent, and dependent nursing actions. Communicable diseases such as malaria and tuberculosis account for most of the disease burden, while complications from pregnancy and childbirth also take a huge toll. According to the United Nations Millennium Development Goals indicators, in 2008, maternal mortality rates were 240 per 100,000 and infant mortality rates were 27 per 1000 live births.

Natural disasters continue to be a major unpredictable challenge for the country. The government
